Statistics and Evaluating Websites

Mrs. Myers met with Mrs. Dunlap during her planning period to discuss an upcoming statistic project. After hearing some of the potential topics the students could be choosing, Mrs. Myers suggested teaching the students better Google search strategies and how to evaluate websites (since not everything on the Internet is accurate or up-to-date). Mrs. Myers went over a website evaluation process with Mrs. Dunlap's students, worked with them on using advanced Google search features, and walked them through evaluating two sample websites. The students then evaluated four websites in an independent exercise. Mrs. Myers looked at the student submissions on Edmodo and graded them.

SCPL Teen Programming

David Suarez, one of the teen librarians from the Spartanburg County Public Library, talked to some classes on October 28th. He let the students know what kind of activities were available to them and introduced them to two new apps the library offers.

David (or any of the teen librarians) would love to talk to English or history classes. Email us if you would like to schedule a time and day.

Choose Your Own Topic

Mrs. Potter brought her English classes into the library for a research project. Each student could pick his or her own topic. To help students find up-to-date and accurate information, Mrs. Layne introduced them to DISCUS. The students used DISCUS and books in the library collection to conduct their research.

203 classes visited the library since school started

Green Screen Uses

For a country research project, Mrs. Little gave her students several options for presenting information including iMovie. While the class used the library, Mrs. Layne took students who decided to create an iMovie and showed them how to use the green screen to drop photos or videos of their country behind the speaker.

Mr. Maddox's film studies class also received a quick introduction to using the green screen. Remember - it's clickclickclick click click click!

Author Author!

Mrs. Brito's students completed their books October 30th. Mrs. Myers started the project by showing the students picture books and going over the parts of a book. The students wrote a sentence on each page and drew a picture to go with that sentence. Each student will read his book to the class during the week of November 10-14.
